Essay Question:

17. The compositions of Joseph Haydn were influenced by the different positions he held throughout life. For a number of years, Haydn was the court composer for Prince Paul Anton of the Esterhazy family. The prince was an amateur violinist, so Haydn composed string quartets that the prince and his court musicians could play together. Haydn transformed the string quartet from a genre in which the violin was accompanied by other instruments into an ensemble composed of equal voices. It is possible that if Prince Paul Anton had been a virtuoso violinist, Haydn would not have changed the nature of composing for the string quartet.

When the prince failed to let the musicians adjourn for the summer, Haydn composed the “Farewell Symphony”. In the final movement of this work, Haydn thins the texture throughout the movement as small groups of musicians leave the stage when their part is done. The final notes are played by only 2 people, and all others have left the stage. Generally, the final movements of symphonies at this time were upbeat and end chords played by the full ensemble. Most assuredly, Haydn would not have composed the final movement of the symphony in this manner if the prince had let the musicians start their summer break in a timely manner.

Later, Haydn moved to London and was asked to compose symphonies for a larger orchestra. He no longer worked for one benefactor and needed compositions that appealed to large audiences. This new compositional style was popular to the common man. During this period, Haydn used folk songs in compositions like the London Symphonies and in his oratorios. The English folk songs grounded these large works with snippets of music familiar to the listener.

In 1795, Haydn returned to Vienna. As a successful, aging musician, Haydn no longer composed to please large audiences. Instead he composed for posterity. In this period, he composed “The Creation” and “The Seasons”; pieces designed to explore the meaning of life, and not to appeal to the lay audience.
